

Masterclass Amsterdam

Peter Jakob and Willem Beckers

18 & 19 March 2019

“The most tragic form of loss isn’t the loss of security; it’s the loss of the capacity to imagine that things could be different”
(Ernst Bloch)

Parents with children that show severe aggressive, anxious and dismissive behavior can feel that their efforts are met with a chronic absence of reciprocity. In addition, feelings of shame and isolation add to the complexity of their situation.

These parents tend to get stuck in a state of detachment, estranged from the experience of 'mattering' in the lives of their children and their adult environment. As therapists and counselors, dealing with so few positive interactions, we tend to get swallowed into a similar experience of frustration and hopelessness.

During these two practise-based days, you will be invited into co-authoring new narratives of preferred futures with parents, by using a variety of methods to stimulate imaginary processes and creative conversations. These new and significant interventions help parents overcome erasure in the Non Violent Resistance process and offer a much more hopeful trajectory.

“How can we stimulate more constructive relational expectations?”

How can these experiences become precedents for building one sided action that actually supports change?

Why does imagination matter?”

Building on their own unique and shared therapeutic approaches, Peter Jakob and Willem Beckers aim to expand freedom of movement for you and the families you are working with.

As a bonus, Marie Luise Shreiter will do a short presentation on recent neuroscientific theories that may underlie the effectiveness of imaginary methods in clinical practice. She is a clinical psychologist and doctoral researcher at the University of Dresden. She is trained in Non Violent Resistance and is currently writing an article together with Peter Jakob and Willem Beckers.

Dr. Peter Jakob is a consultant clinical psychologist, systemic family therapist and Director of PartnershipProjects UK. He has introduced Non Violent Resistance to the UK and is known as a prolific international presenter.

Willem Beckers is a systemic psychotherapist and staff member at Interactie-Academie and an associate trainer for PartnershipProjects UK. He also works as a systemic psychotherapist at a practice for child psychiatry and family therapy.
